Preface

Israel is a central focus of research at the Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies. We have a long-standing program analyzing the impact of participation in Taglit-Birthright Israel, an educational program that has engaged nearly 350,000 diaspora young adults with Israel. We study attitudes toward Israel and patterns of immigration-emigration. In addition, our JData.com project tracks the teaching of Israel in Jewish education from preschool though high school. This directory of Israel studies courses reflects a different research thrust and is part of our efforts to understand how Israel is understood, not just by Jews, but by the broader population. Our focus is on how Israel is taught as an academic subject at North American colleges and universities.

The past decade has witnessed tremendous growth in the number and types of courses that teach about Israel, as well the diversity of universities where these courses are offered. The directory documents this growth and allows comparison to earlier efforts (including our own 2008-09 report and directory) to track evolution of Israel studies as a focus of academic teaching and learning. Interest in Israel is no doubt fueled by the conflict between Israel and the Arab world. Many of the courses that include content about Israel deal with the conflict. But the development of Israel studies now encompasses a wider array of subject matter – from art and music to history and politics. Perhaps reflecting Israel’s growing international importance as an innovator in fields such as energy, computer science and medicine, teaching about Israel has evolved considerably. This directory documents the current landscape of courses about Israel and is part of a series of efforts on the part of the Cohen Center to assess the development and impact of Israel studies. A detailed analysis of trends in the study of Israel in American universities is available in a forthcoming article in Israel Studies, “Teaching Israel at American Universities: Growth, Placement, and Future Prospects.”

The emergence of Israel studies as a field that is taught and researched at American universities is a welcome development. The on-going conflict between Israel and its neighbors calls out for better understanding. A foundation for such understanding is education and appreciation for the history and culture of Israel. I hope that this directory, and the companion work being conducted by Dr. Annette Koren and her research team at the Cohen Center, will contribute to fostering the field and enhancing scholarly understanding of Israel.

Introduction

This directory of 2011-12 Israel course offerings at American colleges and universities has been created to document the prevalence and diversity of Israel studies in the academy. Since 2004, we have been tracking the development and expansion of academic courses about Israel at North American universities, assessing both the scope and impact of courses (see most recently, Koren, Boxer, and Samuel, 2012 and Koren, et al., 2013). The present compilation follows an initial directory of 2008-09 courses (Koren and Einhorn, 2009).

To facilitate comparison, the present directory utilizes a similar methodology to the 2008-09 edition. There has been a small increase in Israel-focused courses between 2008-09 and 2011-12, following a two-thirds increase in Israel-focused courses from 2005-06 to 2008-09. The number of courses offered remained strong particularly at larger, more prestigious schools with large Jewish populations.¹ Israel-focused courses have been identified at 194 of 316 campuses in the study and Israel-related courses at 279 campuses. These courses are offered across a wide variety of departments and topics, including Israeli society, politics, thought, and culture. The presence of Israel courses in the nation’s universities suggests that institutions consider Israel to be a subject for serious academic exploration and rational discourse. A full analysis of the directory and trends in course offerings over time, along with methodological details, can be found in Koren, Aronson, and Saxe (in press).

The institutions included in this directory represent a purposive sample of 316 schools, following the criteria shown in Table A-1. They include top-ranked national and regional universities (following U.S. News and World Report rankings). In addition, unranked and lower ranked schools with large Jewish populations are included.

¹ The estimates of Jewish undergraduate population comes from Hillel Guide to Jewish Life on Campus (see http://www.hillel.org/HillelApps/JLOC/Search.aspx).

* Colleges and universities in the last two categories were included on the basis of Jewish populations of 5% or more of the undergraduate population or at the request of the 2008-09 study’s funder. Jewish institutions such as the Jewish Theological Seminary or Touro College are unranked.

The directory includes courses from class schedules in the fall through summer of 2011-2012. Using a defined set of search terms (e.g. Israel, Middle East, Jerusalem, Palestine) and other criteria for inclusion, student research assistants searched course schedules at each university and college. Only undergraduate classes or graduate courses open to undergraduates were included.

All courses were classified as either “Israel-focused” or “Israel-related.” Israel-focused courses deal exclusively with modern Israel. Israel-related courses have broader subject areas, of which modern Israel is only a part. Courses on ancient Israel are not included in the directory. Research assistants used catalog descriptions and syllabi, when available, to classify courses as Israel-focused on Israel-related. It is possible that some of these have been misclassified.

For a number of reasons, this directory likely undercounts Israel courses. Courses listed as “special topics” often have no descriptions and therefore may have been missed by the research team. At the same time, some courses may be included that were not actually taught (due to failure to enroll adequate numbers of students. Anecdotal evidence suggests that it is more likely that the former outnumber the latter and that more courses were missed than were included incorrectly. In confirmation of this undercount, an audit of the 41 top ranked universities, big ten schools, and liberal arts colleges, conducted after analysis work was completed, identified several additional courses that are included in this directory but, in order to preserve comparability to the 2008-09 methodology, were not used in the analysis. Such courses are indicated with an asterisk (*).²

² Additional corrections to the directory may be directed to Annette Koren at akoren@brandeis.edu and will be included in a subsequent edition of the directory.
