The acquisition of things engenders both a complex set of emotions and a series of obligations for individuals and institutions. This lecture by Morag Kersel will examine the differing strands of emotional attachment to objects and the rival obligations created by the desire to “own”, to display, and to interpret the material remains from the Holy Land. Kersel will address the politics of public display, the role of the museum, and the consequences of an attachment to things.

Co-sponsored by the Department of Near Eastern & Judaic Studies and the Department of Anthropology at Brandeis University