Prof. McGuffey’s research agenda examines the social psychology of family life and the experience of inter-personal trauma. His work primarily highlights how race, gender, and social class both constrain and create the choices survivors pursue in the aftermath of trauma. His two current projects focus on sexual trauma. One examines how gender, sexuality, and race shape parental responses to child sexual abuse; and the other investigates the social psychology of Black rape survivors in the U.S., Ghana and South Africa. McGuffey is the recipient of two American Sociological Association awards: the 2006 Sally Hacker Award for research excellence from the sex and gender section and the 2009 “Best Research Article Award” from the section on sexualities. His research has been supported by the Ford Foundation and a Research Incentive Grant. He has given invited lectures at the Center for Children and Childhood Studies at Rutgers University, The Center for the Study of Violence and Prevention at the University of Colorado, Harvard University, and the University of the Western Cape in South Africa.
