Nobody’s child

The international adoption trade is a billion-dollar industry, involving the lucrative sale of children from developing countries. Nepal, which is one of the countries most affected by this practice, has seen a sharp increase in adoptions in recent years. This has raised concerns about the welfare of the children involved and the ethical implications of the trade. The government has taken steps to address these issues, including enacting new laws and regulations to protect the rights of children. However, the challenge remains to ensure that the adoption process is fair and just, and that the best interests of the children are always at the forefront.
