Gels containing the components of the photosensitive oscillatory Belousov-Zhabotinsky reaction have been predicted to move toward darker regions when illuminated by a patterned light source. We have demonstrated experimentally that, with appropriately chosen patterns of light intensity, these gels can move either toward or away from brighter regions, mimicking the behavior of phototropic and photophobic organisms.